

IT'S ALL IN THE WAY YOU STICK THE FEATHERS ON

If you wish to be in fashion this spring see that the feathers come from an unexpected place on your hat.

This season the up-to-date hat builder is not trying to put a lot of trimming on every creation she sends out, but she is trying to give every hat an individuality of its own. She succeeds in making them individual but not always beautiful.

However, the one illustrated combines both these qualities.

It is of dark blue straw, faced underneath with dark blue velvet, and its only trimming is a bunch of bird of paradise feathers in white tucked in the crown toward the front and allowed to float back over the extended brim.

There is a decided change this year in the shapes of the hats, most of them showing the brim lengthened greatly at the back and cut off at the front.

Hats are being rolled back more and more from the face, which is rather disconcerting news to the brown-eyed woman, who never looks as well as in a hat shading her eyes, and making them look more limpid.

After supper walk a mile.

"I got a new attachment for the family piano," said Mr. Growcher, "and it's a wonderful improvement." "What is it?" "A lock and key."
